JAMAICA: MOVES TO RESUME HANGINGS UPDATE

Following is an update to the external document; JAMAICA - Moves to resume hangings: Amnesty International's concerns, (AI Index:AMR 38/01/93), which was sent to all sections in the last Weekly Mailing. Some sections have already received the text of this document, with specific recommended actions to start immediately. Other sections may be required to take further action in the future and are asked to keep the document as relevant background. Please draw this item to the attention of Campaign Coordinators.

The Jamaica Court of Appeal will now start hearing appeals against prisoners' capital murder reclassifications from mid-February - not this week as was originally announced. This delay is due at least in part to pressures brought to bear on the authorities by lawyers who had been given inadequate time to prepare legal representation. No execution warrants will be issued before this period. (It has now been conceded by the authorities that legal aid will be available for prisoners seeking a review of their classification, although the level of legal aid in Jamaica is very low.)

We now know that a further 35 death row prisoners had their offences reclassified so far this month. Twenty-three were reclassified "capital murder" and 12 as "noncapital murder". Since October 1992, therefore, at least 108 death row prisoners to date have had their offences reclassified as "capital murder" and 59 have had their death sentences commuted under the new law.

Amnesty International is unsure of the exact number of prisoners currently on death row, due to new death sentences being passed and the as yet incomplete reclassification process. However, the first paragraph of the external document cited above should have added the sentence "More than 270 prisoners were under sentence of death when the new law came into effect" (that, is, as of October 1992).
