Emanuel Zeltser (m), US national

US national Emanuel Zeltser was sentenced on 11 August 2008 to three years in prison for “using false official documents” and “economic espionage” following a closed trial. An appeal to the Belarusian Supreme Court was denied on 31 October 2008, also in a closed hearing. He is being held at a penal colony near Mogilev in eastern Belarus. His health has deteriorated further, and the Belarusian authorities are continuing to deprive him of essential medication for various ailments, including diabetes, heart problems and severe arthritis.

At the time of his trial in August, Emanuel Zeltser’s arthritis was so severe police officers had to carry him to the courtroom. His state-appointed lawyer described his health as “catastrophic” following a visit on 21 November 2008. Since his conviction, Emanuel Zeltser has been visited by US Embassy officials, most recently on 17 December 2008, during which he reiterated complaints about suffering chronic pain in the back and legs, acute gout and very high blood pressure.

The Belarusian authorities allowed Emanuel Zeltser to be visited by an independent doctor on 6 January 2009, who referred to his health as “a time bomb.” Following the visit the doctor confirmed that Emanuel Zeltser is suffering from increased high blood pressure and additionally from poor circulation in his legs and feet, bouts of depression and, furthermore, that he requires heart surgery. He is receiving some medication, but does not have access to all the treatment he needs.
